I currently tried using the [UIImage imageWithContentsOfFile:path:] method (as opposed to using the UIImagePNGRepresentation/UIImageJPEGRepresentation), which is what Apple does, but it doesn't seem to work (it doesn't give me the same results). Does anyone have any advice? A: Turns out I just needed to change the name of the file to png using an extension (e.g. test.png -> test.png.png). I had misunderstood this line from the UIImage imageWithContentsOfFile documentation: If you specify an extension of an image file, the file is assumed to be an image to which the specified extension has been appended. Although it is not explicitly mentioned, it seems that the file extension is what gets used by UIImage. For example, I can use [UIImage imageWithContentsOfFile:path:scale:orientation] when my image is named test.png.jpg to get the same results as I can use [UIImage imageWithContentsOfFile:path:]. Maybe I can even use it to get the same results as [UIImage imageNamed:], but I'm not sure. I am an authority in my field and I know everything about the products that I carry. I love it that way. A number of years ago when I opened the first PC tools & Powers Tools store I saw the opportunity to make this a better business. I wasn't the only one thinking that way so we developed this system where only employees from the company that develops the hardware and software can carry the products.I believe the understanding of PC and PowersTools products combined with the relationship between the owners we can make your store a better one.
